The Special Shareholder Meeting Proposal 5 Deserves Shareholder Votes Especially after the Unsupported FedEx Statement Next to this Proposal.

FedEx claims that FedEx shareholders have a meaningful right to call for a special shareholder meeting which is totally unsupported by FedEx. FedEx joins the long list of more than 100 companies that fail to give even one example of a special shareholder meeting ever taking place at a company worth at least $1 Billion that has a right to call for a special shareholder similar to the so-called current FedEx right.

The FedEx right is not meaningful if there has never been an instance of shareholders making use of a right similar to it at any company anywhere for more than a decade.

FedEx says that its shareholders should simply be satisfied with its engagement program that brags about shareholder engagement at an annual meeting that is not an in-person meeting and is scheduled at 6:00 am for West Coast shareholders.

FedEx says that its shareholders should simply be satisfied with its current governance practices, which are totally unremarkable.
